How much does literature seem to convey the world around you? Have you been able to lift your eyes from the pages of a short story and to see that fictional world unfold before you? Have you read non-realistic fiction that makes the connection between life and literature obvious? This course will present a new way of reading literature by tying short stories to current events and social concerns. We will begin with the film Big Fish, which explores the power of storytelling and its relevance to our everyday lives. Subsequently, every week, you will read one short story published in the U.S. and abroad, and be asked to link it to social, political, technological, environmental, or scientific events through recent articles and podcasts. In conjunction with analyzing short stories, class discussions will relate to "adjustment to college life"; although these discussions may or may not stem from weekly readings, they should assist you in fostering a campus community and in discovering resources when adjusting to college life.

Short Stories, Podcasts, and News Articles: Merging What We do With What We Read

Attributes: Second Year, Liberal Arts
Class Equivalents: SP1595/THEA265
Combined Section ID: 1028(THEA 265/270/275 M01)

Description: This course calls students who seek to enhance their communication skills, become more comfortable in front of an audience, and/or explore a career in performance. Over nine weeks you will work in a team with your peers, learning to create original scenes on your feet, using as your foundation the classical "Yes, And ..." paradigm of improv comedy. Rehearsals will culminate in a performance at the NYC campus: you will deliver a never-before-seen and never-to-be-seen-again original production. Note that this class does not involve sitting and observing in a passive role: you will be active onstage, where the emphasis is on collaboration and group story-building. The class is best suited for enthusiastic and generous people ready to work hard at messing around. Attendance is mandatory on Sep 27 (first class), Dec 6, and Dec 13 (performance). If you will have to miss any other rehearsals, you must clear this with the instructor prior to registration.

Notes: Registration is mandatory and requires permission. Prior to registering, each student must contact the instructor: Prof. Eve Armstrong: earmst01@nyit.edu, with subject "THEA: improv."
